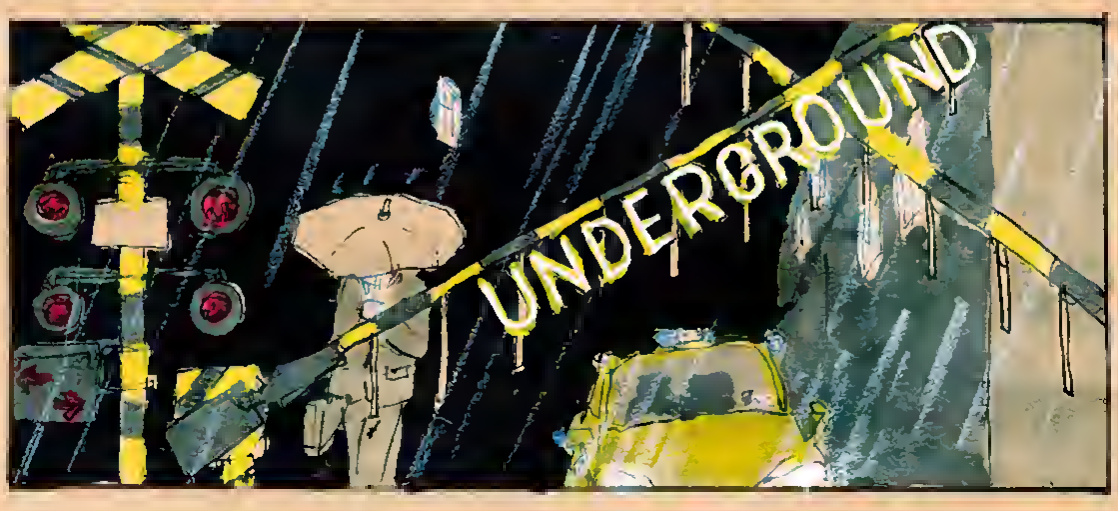
RAPID

COMMUTER



UNDERGROUND

BAR

Y'know today,
I fell into this deep sleep on the subway, and when I woke up, there was a moment where I had no idea whether I was coming or going.
Oh, a customer came here not too long ago with a similar story.
It seems like it was when he was coming back from a city that was an exact copy of Tokyo.
What's up with that?

He says that he comes and goes when he falls into a deep sleep while the commuter express is running through areas deep under the ground. He insisted most people went there never realising.

Haha.

So then,

Wouldn't it make for a better story if you could go there through platform 9 and ¾ or the space between the 7th and 8th floor?

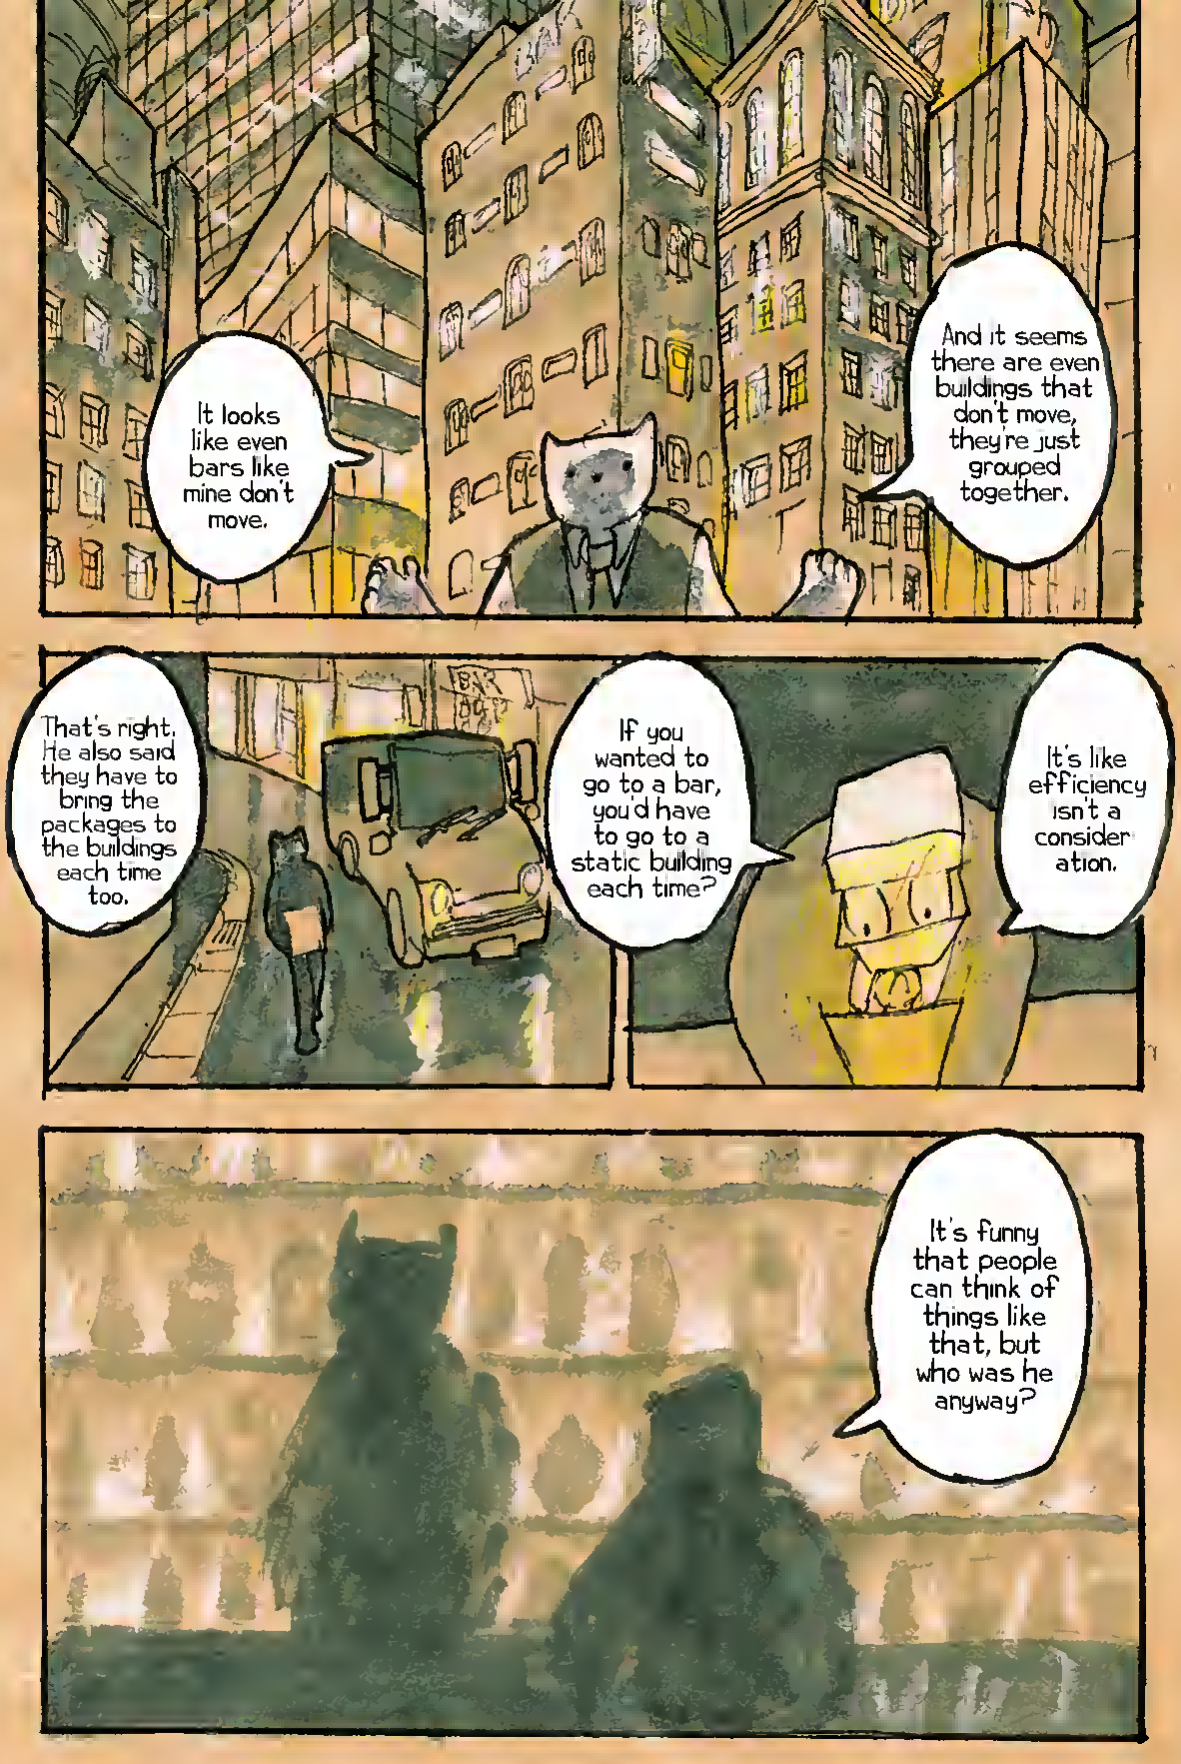
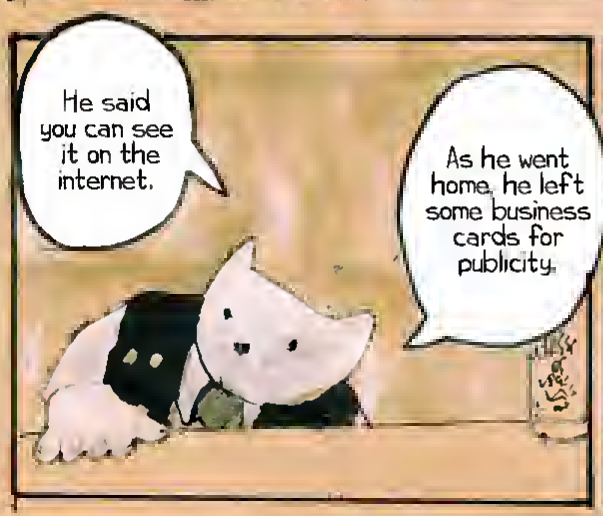
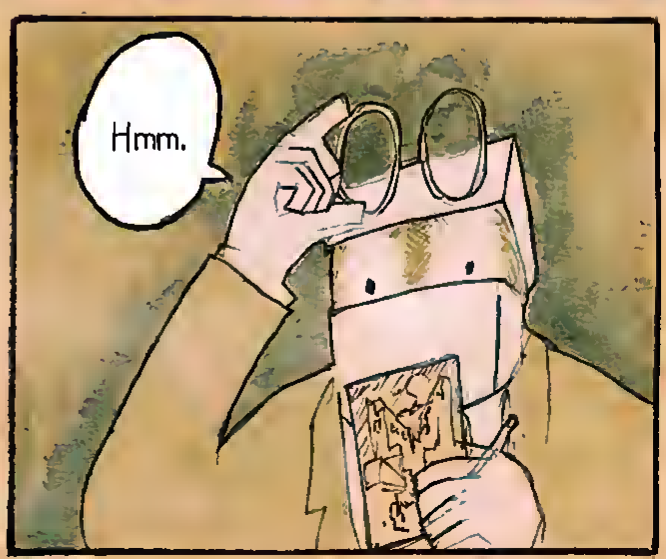
So in that city, humans shaped like crocodiles and rabbits spoke like people.

Ehh...



It looks like even bars like mine don't move.
And it seems there are even buildings that don't move, they're just grouped together.
That's right. He also said they have to bring the packages to the buildings each time too.
If you wanted to go to a bar, you'd have to go to a static building each time?
It's like efficiency isn't a consider ation.
It's funny that people can think of things like that, but who was he anyway?





He was wearing glasses?!